The standard you use for a particular field is the one that is the most common among the countries you are targeting, that is, the standard used in the country that has the largest market share among the countries where you are targeting. Why can you use the standard of the country you are targeting? In other words, why not use a standard that is the same as the one used in your country? While the uniformity of the different countries' standards is a great advantage for a global standard, it also has the disadvantage of making it difficult to determine which standard should be used in your country. When you are developing a product for foreign markets, it is better to choose a standard that matches the standard used in your own country. It is also better to choose a standard in your country that has not been pre-defined by a standardization body or the regulatory authority of your country. In these cases, the standard you use might not be the one required by your regulatory authority. However, it will also be the standard that people are using at home.

Reason 5: Cultural Reasons

The following are some of the cultural reasons to choose a foreign standard:

Two words in Spanish: Recurso

You can request a specific technical resource from your office and you will be sent a material by the top-recruited Latin American engineers. As a result, you will be provided with a superior quality material at a much lower price than if you had to buy and distribute the material on your own. The engineers are eager to help you out, so they know exactly what you need. They will even help by researching for you or suggesting a material that matches your needs. You will be amazed by the volume of material you can get with this
