The Mac's OS X native Notification Center is a standard feature of the OS and is something that most users will already have. This tutorial will help you get to know it a little more. Getting notifications in your Mac is made easy by OS X. There are many different types of notifications you can receive. The most common notifications users get are the alert and alert banner notifications. Alerts are the smaller notification items that you will often get at the top of your screen when an application is ready for you to pay attention to, such as new emails. Alert banners are the larger notifications that are at the top of the screen, usually with the exclamation point symbol on it, that will pop up for a short period of time, letting you know that something is important. The notifications in your Notification Center are usually located at the top of your screen. They are to the right of the Clock and often have that "double-arrow" symbol that indicates that there are more notifications available. You can also view notifications by clicking on the notification icon on the far

Is there any program/s that will take multiple pictures from the same position and put them in an animated slideshow? I'm sick of looking at the same pictures again and again. Also, I really hate those programs that has you have to manually click a couple of times in order to change the speed of the slideshow. I'm looking for a simple program that allows me to click and it auto-cycles through photos. I have a
