The effect of monolayer cultures of Madin-Darby canine kidney (MDCK) cells on the lethal effects of endotoxin was studied. In this paper, the results of experiments carried out with both native MDCK cells and a variant MDCK line (MC-LR), whose cytoplasmic response to endotoxin is markedly reduced, are reported. The pattern of endotoxin-induced lethality (for an LD50 of 100 micrograms/mouse) was found to be similar for both cell lines, but in MC-LR cells the LD50 was increased from 2.2 to 3.4 micrograms/mouse (a 37% increase). The supernatants from MDCK and MC-LR cell cultures incubated in the presence of endotoxin were prepared and tested for their ability to enhance the lethal effects of endotoxin in mice. The supernatants from both cell types were found to reduce the LD50 of endotoxin from 6.8 to 4.6 micrograms/mouse (a 33% increase). The results demonstrate that these monolayer cultures of MDCK cells are effective in protecting against endotoxin lethality. The protective effect is mediated by the production of a soluble factor, inasmuch as it is blocked by an antiserum directed against monocyte migration inhibitory factor (MIF) and by a MIF receptor-specific monoclonal antibody. The use of extracellular matrix biopolymers in cardiovascular tissue engineering. The field of tissue engineering aims to develop artificial replacements for damaged or diseased tissues. In cardiovascular tissue engineering, the application of biopolymers has received increased attention as a potential means to recapitulate in vitro certain aspects of the extracellular matrix. The extracellular matrix plays a critical role in the maintenance of tissue architecture and is composed of proteins and polysaccharides. The current review focuses on the extracellular matrix proteins, specifically the collagen-based extracellular matrix proteins. The goal of this review is to examine their potential in the context of cardiovascular tissue engineering.
