2014-08-15 05:37 Shankar was two years old when his parents married. They lived in the rural village of Mallamagadas in the Nalgonda district of Telangana, a region of southern India. There were 10 children in the family. Shakar was the second eldest, two years older than his sisters Rajamma and Bindu, and three years younger than the twins; Bharat and Ajay. Soon after marriage, a son was born to the couple. That was the last of their children, who was named Nagesh. The family grew and prospered, and the four brothers were sent to public schools where they excelled and they excelled in extracurricular activities. Nagesh was the top ranked student in his school. Back in the village, the boy grew up to be a well disciplined and well mannered young man. He was loyal to his parents and friends. He had many relatives in the village, all of whom were very close to him. His father loved him the most, because Shankar was the first son, and the last of four. His mother, however, was very proud of her eldest son. She said that he had shown his maturity early in life, and that he was a very mature and responsible person. Shankar excelled in all his subjects; except mathematics. However, he passed and easily secured a seat in the medium school to study Maths. He passed all the three levels of the Exams. Soon he passed his 7th Standard leaving school, and joined the best college in the neighboring town. His father, with the blessings of his mother, demanded that he should study his bachelor's degree in commerce. Shankar agreed and was very happy with the choice. Soon he was a reliable student, and excelled again. It was the practice among his friends to become the class monitor. During his 2nd year of B.Com., he found a job in a jewellery company as a salesman. His work began well, and he was very efficient. His colleagues also liked him. Later, on a visit to a friend, he came across his classmate in a jewelry company and got a job as a assistant manager. He was very happy with his new job. One day he went to the small 3e33713323
