Mother-offspring pair delays social contact in a social species: The effect of infant illness, age and sex. Mothers of infants (N = 73) were exposed to a novel person, either the baby's maternal grandmother or a stranger, during a 2-min free play session. Minimally clothed infants, ages 2 weeks to 12 months, were observed in a standardized setting. Mothers' ratings of their own visual and auditory perception of the infants were recorded prior to and immediately following exposure to the stranger. Infant illness was coded before and during exposure to the stranger. The experimental procedure was counterbalanced between infants of the same sex and between mothers and grandmothers.

Infants of mothers and grandmothers made social contacts with the stranger for less time than infants of their mothers. Controlling for infant age, sex, severity of illness and maternal perception of the stranger, mothers' ratings of their own auditory perception of the infant were significantly lower following exposure to the stranger, suggesting that motherhood had a suppressive effect on her perception of her infant's social communicative behavior. Infants of grandmothers did not show any significant group differences. Comparative efficiency of various polishing systems on three composite resin materials. A comparative in vitro study was performed to determine the effectiveness of three polishing systems for three composite resin materials. A total of 200 specimens of each of the three composite resins (BisCover, Heliomolar and Valux Plus) were constructed according to the manufacturers' specifications. Using a brass mould that contained cavities with circular edges, the resin material was inserted into the cavities until it was 1 mm deep. The specimens were then polished either with 40- or 60-fluted diamond burs and polishing systems (Mani-Gard, Enhance, Enhance Mini, Enhance-Plus, Opti-Twin, Opti-Glide, Opti-Polish, Opti-Seal, Opti-Disc and Shofu; Buehler, LTD, Lake Bluff, IL, USA). Light-activated polish was performed twice. The differences in roughness (Ra) of the composite resin surfaces were calculated and analysed using a two-way analysis of variance. The highest increase in roughness was observed for the Enhance-Plus (p
