The Week in Criminology Happy Tuesday! Here's what's going on in the world of criminology. In a recent column, I discussed the New York Police Department's (NYPD) dramatic decrease in violent crime from the late 1970s through the mid-1980s. As I noted in the post, the high crime rate of the early to mid-1980s had been accompanied by a surge in cocaine use, particularly among young people. This cocaine use had a negative impact on police enforcement and a positive impact on the crime rate. A new paper from researchers at the University of Pennsylvania argues that the downturn in the crime rate happened well before and well after the surge in cocaine use. While it is true that the number of people using cocaine increased, the researchers found no evidence that this increase drove the decline in crime. Of course, the counterargument is that there were other factors at play besides the consumption of drugs. But, a 2009 study found that legalizing drugs does not significantly increase drug use, so perhaps the researchers are right. In the NY Post, an NYPD official defended the department's stance on policing, saying, "It's not the criminal's job to tell us that we're wrong, or that we're doing a bad job, or that we're wrong on the Constitution." It seems like a pretty blatant capitulation to the Police Benevolent Association's (PBA) demands that the NYPD stop its use of stop-and-frisk. PBA leaders had demanded that the NYPD be more aggressive in making stops of young men, based on the number of alleged crimes committed by young men, but now the police have changed their strategy 81e310abbf
