The recent measles outbreak in New York City has shocked not just residents, but any parent or caregiver who has faced firsthand the devastating effects of the virus. As the number of cases continue to rise, so do fears of secondary transmission in schools and public places. In the face of a global pandemic like this, what are the best ways to prevent the spread of disease? Why do people get sick? Measles is a highly infectious viral respiratory disease caused by a virus (measles virus) that is spread via direct contact with an infected individual or, less frequently, via the air. Infection typically begins with a virus or bacteria being introduced into the body through an open wound or mucous membrane. Once the infection is established, the virus can disseminate through the body, which ultimately results in the symptoms of the disease (fever, cough and conjunctivitis). Once the patient develops a febrile illness and an “itchy” red rash on the cheeks or neck, known as rashes, there are no treatments available to stop the virus or cure the disease. What can be done, however, is to provide the individual with fluids and rest as the disease progresses. The measles virus can survive for 1-2 days in the air and 3-4 hours on surfaces. In addition to the respiratory route of infection, the virus can also be transmitted through the gastrointestinal tract via direct exposure to the mouth, nose and eyes. How does measles spread? Measles virus is transmitted through the droplets released by an infected person when they cough, sneeze, talk, or laugh. The virus can be also spread through an indirect contact (bacteria on the hands) when the person handling the virus comes in contact with mucus membranes (eyes, nose or mouth) of an infected individual. Another way that this can occur
