Methods for Developing a Pocket Guide for Children's Communication Needs to Improve Chronic Pain Management. Chronic pain is a common pediatric health problem. The purpose of this research was to address a gap in the literature on this problem by developing a prototype guide to help patients manage their pain. We used a collaboration among pain researchers and a child and adolescent speech-language pathologist to develop a prototype guide using a three-phase project (development, testing, and revision) using a qualitative method. A paper prototype of the guide was developed, and additional revisions were made to the guide based on feedback from caregivers. A parent focus group was used to evaluate the guide. Analysis of focus group comments and open-ended individual interviews was conducted to make final changes to the guide. This manuscript describes the methods and findings from the three phases of the project that was used to develop a prototype guide. The guide was piloted, and revisions were made to the guide based on feedback from caregivers who used the guide. A paper prototype of the guide was developed to facilitate review by pain researchers and a child and adolescent speech-language pathologist. Additional revisions to the guide were made based on feedback from caregivers who used the guide. Analysis of the focus group comments and open-ended individual interviews for the individual interviews allowed for evaluation of the guide. Caregivers found the guide to be a useful tool in managing pain and said that the guide was missing information. The guide was revised based on the feedback and responses of the caregivers. A paper prototype of the guide was developed to facilitate review and revision by clinicians and researchers. Emerging Practices for the Control of Avian Influenza - a Focus on Australian Layers. This paper reviews past and current practices, and provides recent Australian initiatives and research developments in which research has been conducted to improve layer health and welfare, and which may influence the control of infectious avian influenza virus (AIV). The Australian layer industry faces a number of challenges, including the emergence of new strains of AIV, the continuing threat of biosecurity breaches, the threat of trade restrictions, the increasing prevalence of diseases such as Newcastle disease, and the imposition of additional regulations including mandatory vaccination. A range of activities have been undertaken by industry groups and government, including the provision of web-based information to improve awareness of avian disease risks, a program to promote biosecurity measures among layer farmers, the development of a national biosecurity plan and mandatory vaccination of chickens, and investigation into new technologies and emerging practices to improve bird
