Embarcadero . BANGKOK (Reuters) - Thailand said on Tuesday it had called off a vote on a military takeover plan because it faced widespread opposition, prompting Prime Minister Yingluck Shinawatra to call off the vote for now. Thailand's Prime Minister Yingluck Shinawatra speaks during a news conference at Government House in Bangkok, Thailand December 29, 2013. REUTERS/Damir Sagolj The vote, which had been scheduled to take place on Friday, was seen as a test of the power of the army-dominated anti-government red-shirt movement, which backs Shinawatra, and her Pheu Thai party. "Because all opponents are anxious about the issue and the country is uneasy about the constitution, I will not hold a constitutional referendum," Foreign Minister Don Pramudwinai told reporters. "So I canceled today's meeting." The army ended its support for Yingluck, whose government is accused of corruption, in May and the coup leader-turned-prime minister threw in the towel on the vote after the red shirts became a major threat to her rule. The vote was billed as a referendum on whether to draft a new constitution, which would keep the army firmly in charge of Thai politics. The king ordered the military to stage a coup in May to remove Yingluck's government in a bid to stop the red shirts from staging a bloodless insurrection that could have led to an extension of the protests. But the military has failed to contain the anti-government movement which complains about the ruling and been marred by allegations of abuse and impunity. "With the opposition, the Thai people will never accept the draft or any other form of 'neo-rule'," Pheu Thai leader Suthep Thaugsuban said on Twitter. "Thailand is not ready for a draft," he said, accusing the military of trying to re-establish itself after losing power. A spokeswoman for the army said she would not comment on the issue. The army's return to full strength in recent months has led to increased violence and a restoration of military checkpoints across Bangkok. Police fired teargas at protesters in several areas of the Thai capital on Saturday as red shirts blocked roads and staged demonstrations. A number of politicians, activists, businesses and I want to start creating an online version of this application using PHP, Flash, Java SE 1.4, Java SE 5 and more. What is the best way to design and develop the application so that it can be run on all the platforms listed above? A: The application should be split into logical parts like this business logic communication protocols user interface database The business logic should be the same for all the platforms (web, mobile, desktop) and this is where you will be spending your time. The application business logic should be the same for all platforms. The communication protocols maybe the same for web and mobile 3e33713323
