using a raw pointer to pass an array in a constructor a bad idea? This is part of a 3-D world generation code. Is it okay to assume that the user of this code will be passing the various arrays by (`__nonnull`) raw pointers into the constructor (i.e., the first array is a 3-D world location coordinates, the second array is a 3-D world mesh, etc.), instead of by indirection as (`a_world[][][]?` or `world[][][]&`), to keep things less cluttered? Or is it preferred to be explicit about this in the class declaration? `class World { public: World() = default; virtual ~World() = default; virtual void generate() = 0; virtual void get_world_coordinates() = 0; protected: void compute_world_coordinates(const float* coords, int world_dimension); private: int world_dimension; float* world; }; A: What you ask is a question of preference. SharpDesktop is a new Windows program that allows you to avoid all that hassle by launching multiple applications at once. Run different tasks at the same time, minimizing the wait until all of them finish. You can keep your programs just launched all on screen at the same time, or split them into multiple desktops, each one with it's own set of applications that you have opened. SharpDesktop is a handy tool to create multiple desktops, and with this software, you get to create more than just one desktop as well. It keeps your active desktop in the center, and it gives you the possibility to add additional desks as you like. If you have more than one desktop running on your machine, it is possible to transfer windows from one desktops to another. The application is not very difficult to use, and it is very lightweight. Pooladobbie Pooladobbie's Screenshots Pooladobbie's Full Review Pooladobbie is yet another utility that enables you to create multiple desktops within your computer. It is for this purpose that it was designed. You can create as many as you want to, and it will create more space for you to spread out your inactive windows, and do all sorts of your work on. Not only that, it is able to identify the name of your desktops, and it only uses a minimal amount of resources in order to run. When you create more than one desktop you are essentially provided with an additional area to store everything, and also a platform to access that data with only a couple of clicks. It will feel like an entire real estate is in front of you, and any unused space can be put to use in a quick manner. The main window of the application is for the most part free of any clutter, and the only buttons you will find are the ones you will use the most. In the main window you will find, as well as the number of desktops you want to create, the buttons that will be able to move your window between all of them. When you find a window in the main window, you can click on it to have it transferred to a specific desktop, or you can drag it around by holding the mouse over it, and dropping it on the desktop you would like to store it. The main window contains another button, which is the one that will allow you to move the active desktop to the one you would like to have it. Once the active desktop is in the target desktop, the window will be transferred too. For some people who want to have a clear view of all the windows on the screen at all times, the fact that this application uses a system tray will not be the best solution. In order to create more desktops, the system tray icon that will indicate how many there are will be expanded in size, and your mouse cursor will
