Devices for sensing the velocity and direction of a moving body are used, for example, to determine the position of a car relative to a traffic light and thus to distinguish between cars which stop, cars which enter the traffic light, cars which proceed through the traffic light and cars which leave the traffic light. DE-OS 33 18 311 discloses a device for sensing the velocity and direction of a moving body in which the signal emitted by a sensor, which is arranged on the vehicle, is received by a plurality of receiving elements which are arranged at a fixed distance relative to one another in a line, and the received signals are amplified and evaluated. In order to increase the sensitivity of the sensor, it is known to arrange the receiving elements at very small distances relative to one another. This leads to a large number of receiving elements and requires a corresponding number of receiving and amplification circuits.Q: ContentValues, Encrypted DB I have a project in which I use an encrypted DB, and I
