invention relates generally to apparatus and methods for grinding bodies, and, more particularly, to a grinding apparatus for grinding a workpiece, such as a turbine blade, that includes a dual-stage turbine blade grinding apparatus. Turbine blades are used in a wide variety of applications, including aircraft engines. The turbine blades include opposing airfoils that rotate in unison with a rotor of a turbine engine. Turbine blades are often very complex in their contouring and details. Therefore, the turbine blades are typically formed from a complex casting having a high level of precision. After forming, the turbine blade may be subjected to a grinding process to remove any casting-related defects in order to improve its aerodynamic performance.

The grinding process is commonly performed in a multi-stage process, including multiple grinders. Known grinding processes often use multiple stages of grinders to remove defects from the turbine blade. Each of the grinders in the grinding process can include one or more grinding wheels that are positioned in contact with the turbine blade. Each of the grinding wheels may include a portion of an abrasive surface, such as a diamond wheel. The abrasive surface of the grinding wheel is applied to the turbine blade at a selected angle of incidence relative to the blade surface. As a result, a grinding wheel may be effective in removing material from the turbine blade, and, thus, improving its aerodynamic performance. The turbine blade is supported in a fixture that receives a desired profile of the turbine blade. The grinding wheels are used to remove the desired profile from the turbine blade. In the case of a single
