Some states and territories also have additional voting rights. Voter suppression tactics, fueled by policies in Florida, Ohio, and Virginia, have combined to nullify these rights. In three key swing states, residents of counties where voters were purged, denied absentee ballots or turned away from the polls, likely helped blow the election for presidential candidate Hillary Clinton. The U.S. Supreme Court will decide whether the government can require proof of citizenship when people apply for a federal voter registration form. This form, which is available to all U.S. residents, allows citizens to register to vote at their local election office. It is also used to apply for federal citizenship by obtaining a notice of citizenship status, known as NICS, and to update their registration when moving to a different county.
