The Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) has been in the news for the wrong reasons more times than one can count. And more often than not, the department finds itself at the center of controversy and legal action. Some might argue that it doesn't matter if an officer kills a suspect. But, according to some experts, cops are frequently sued by family members of dead suspects for violating the law that prevents an officer from using deadly force. "We have to think about this critically," says Jeff Robinson, senior director of the Texas Fair Defense Project, which opposes use of lethal force by police officers. "If it turns out that a suspect died under circumstances where there was no reason or justification for the officer to have shot the suspect, that officer could be sued." The letter of the law Robinson says deadly force was made legal for officers in 1973, according to the Supreme Court of the United States, which determined that, for a suspect to be killed, "a police officer may take such action as is reasonably necessary to protect himself or others from death or serious bodily injury." That doesn't mean cops are required to shoot. But if an officer does, he or she could be sued for murder, says Robinson. "There are a lot of officers in this country who think they have to make a split-second decision to pull the trigger," says Robinson. "In many cases, that decision is not warranted and can even be seen as criminal, and all sorts of persons think they can sue and recover damages." Police officers involved in fatal shootings typically receive training in the use of deadly force, but some experts believe there needs to be more. "The challenge is that there is little or no oversight on officers' use of deadly force," says Stephen Stinson, an associate professor at the University of Pennsylvania Law School. Since 1973, police departments across the country have been experimenting with different methods to make it easier to police themselves and identify officers who use excessive force. Deadly officer statistics Some departments have successfully lowered their rates of use of deadly force, says Stinson. The LA Police Department has had at least

70 officers killed in the line of duty since 2001, according to a 2012 PBS report by Michelle Garcia. The trend is not new. Studies have shown the police department was involved in at least 70 police-involved deaths since 1986. However, of that number of officers killed, the department said about 32 deaths
