fashion into a new age with his label Phat Farm January 14, 2012 With a retail empire spanning clothes for children and adults, a music label stocked with the biggest names in dance music and a forthcoming talk show, Russell Simmons has firmly established himself as a man whose words could start a revolution. But it was his idiosyncratic declaration in 2002 that he wanted to start a "People's Revolution" in the fashion world that has come to define his branded clothing company, Phat Farm, as it branches out into a pop culture empire. "I'm going to start a revolution," he told The Hollywood Reporter. "It's going to be a fashion revolution.

Fashion is irrelevant to me because I can't dress." The statement seemed a touch eccentric to some, but the solution Simmons had in mind was born out of a deep-seated, slightly pessimistic view of the fashion industry. "I love fashion," he says now, "but there are no real models of people from my culture. There are no models for black people. It's just all white, and that's not relevant." Featuring a cast of mostly non-white faces — Simmons calls the Phat Farm collection "black pop," the names of the designers included on the label being "diverse" — and showcasing a brand increasingly tied to edgy, contemporary consumer trends, Phat Farm is poised to take on the high fashion world. Simmons has an unlikely ally in his mission, though. "They're crazy, these kids," says fashion publicist David Fairstein, who worked with the label's founders for 10 years. "But Russell is that rare combination of a man of his generation and his age who is still really hip and not just trying to be hip. He's as hip as it gets.
