Related Art In the 1950s, AC power provided by utilities was typically unreliable because of the power outages and voltage interruptions associated with storm conditions. To avoid these interruptions, retailers began offering home generators, which allowed households to generate their own power by connecting a generator to an AC power line and storing energy for later use. Generators commonly comprised motors that charged internal batteries, such as lead acid cells. When power was needed, the batteries would supply electricity until the power supply utility restored normal voltage, and when electricity was not needed, the batteries would simply continue to store energy. In the 1970s, as deregulation of the electrical power industry began to occur, power companies began competing for households' business.
