updates on the game: Facebook: consensus-based investigation of suicide. To examine a method to develop a consensus on clinical and psychological risk factors that contribute to the risk of suicide. An iterative and inductive approach using established structured consensus methodology was used. The Delphi method was used to conduct semi-structured consensus interviews with 34 practising mental health professionals in the U.K. Interviews were analysed using a grounded theory approach. A series of 14 proposed clinical risk factors were examined, and 16 proposed psychological risk factors were examined. The resultant factors were related to current theory, and the degree of consensus was examined. Using Delphi, the proposed clinical risk factors, 'Childhood Trauma', 'Homelessness', 'Hospitalisation', 'Suicidal Cognitions', and 'Suicide attempts', were examined to determine the degree of consensus. The majority of respondents reached consensus on each of the proposed clinical risk factors. In terms of the psychological risk factors, while all of the items reached consensus, there was some disagreement in the degree of consensus for three of the proposed risk factors (i.e. 'Depression', 'Anxiety', 'Substance abuse'). This research is the first to systematically explore clinical and psychological risk factors of suicide using established structured consensus methodology. Such consensus is important for the development of future research, and may also be of relevance to clinicians in terms of identifying risk factors. Larvae and nymphs of Chironomidae (Diptera) from tropical forests in Northeast Brazil. Chironomidae is one of the most abundant families of insects in tropical forest systems. The present study describes the species and habitats of larvae and nymphs of Chironomidae collected from a tropical forest in São Paulo State, Brazil. Two species of Chironomidae were found in the forest, Phymatopus ater, (Panzer, 1798) and Oniscus asellus, (Linnaeus, 1758), representing four genera: Anastrepha, Austrotinodes, Diplochironomus, and Oniscus. The nymphs of P. ater were present from middle to late summer, and
