Field of the Invention This invention relates to the use of terephthalic acid in preparing syndiotactic polyester articles such as are disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 3,445,420. 2. Description of the Prior Art The preparation of polyesters from glycols and aromatic acids is well known. Typically such processes have involved the use of one or more catalyst systems to form the ester linkages. It is known that certain catalyst systems are capable of catalyzing not only the esterification reaction, but also the polymerization reaction by virtue of the presence of compounds containing acid groups which can act as initiators for both reactions. It is also known that the presence of halogens such as bromine in the polymerization reaction generally results in the formation of polyesters having increased crystallinity and melting points. The crystallinity and melting point of the polyester can be controlled by choosing either a catalyst containing no halogen or one that is a mixture of bromine and chlorine. It is also known that polyesters having other desirable properties such as high flexural modulus, heat distortion temperature, tensile and impact strength can be achieved by the
