An assessment of mucosal permeability at the critical perfusion rate. Although patient mucosal permeability to low molecular weight water-soluble substances has been known for many years, there is no generally accepted method for its measurement. The perfusion method which has been developed for such measurements is based on the principle that a decrease in perfusion at a critical rate will cause an increase in the water-soluble substance flux at the mucosal surface. However, the sensitivity of the method to the critical perfusion rate may vary from patient to patient. A value of 0.5 microliter/cm²/min has been previously recommended as an indicator of mucosal permeability. We found that the incidence of maldistribution was high in our patient population, indicating that the recommended critical perfusion rate was inadequate for a majority of patients. We therefore investigated the sensitivity of the mucosal permeability measurements to the perfusion rate. An assessment of the sensitivity of the method suggested that, at a perfusion rate of 1 microliter/cm²/min, approximately 35% of patients showed maldistribution. A perfusion rate of 0.5 microliter/cm²/min should be used to determine mucosal permeability in patients who have a perfusion rate of 0.5 microliter/cm²/min.

Q: Why would someone leak a 10 year old code?
