Gaya State Gaya State or Gandaki Pradesh was a princely state of the former Kangra Agency in the Punjab during the British Raj. It had the headquarters at Simla and the ruler of Gaya was known as the Maharaja of Gaya. Surrounded by British India its activities were minimal and the last maharaja surrendered his state to the British Government in 1947. He died in 1963 and the state became part of India. History The predecessor of Gaya State, Jats of Dewal was, historically, a powerful clan and it had a most important fortified town of Gumustan, in the south-west corner of Gaya State. In 1367 it conquered a number of small states in the Potohar region, including Kangra. In 1575 Shaikh Fareiz, a descendant of the prominent royal house in Lahore, founded a new capital at Simla. In 1935, Gaya State became a British protectorate, with the Maharaja being given the title of 'Maharaja', because his status was no longer that of a Muslim Nawab under the British Mughal Empire. The rulers also derived their title from their capital Simla, which is itself named from Maharaja Jind Kaur Singh's nickname: Simvoola, which means "Bald Mountain". Simla was the capital of Gaya State between 1935 to 1947. After 1947, it was part of India and
