What's new:

Killengreen2016-12-25T00:00:00ZIf you're worried about vaping, you're not alone. Many players who previously used e-cigarettes are choosing this new technology over smokeless tobacco because it's safer. But some parents are concerned that vaping may be too addictive, and we'll explain why that's not the case. Plus, there are many different types of e-cigarette devices. Which one should you pick? And what flavors do they have? If you're curious about vaping, continue reading to find out more. There's one common belief about e-cigs being dangerous: that they can be as dangerous as smoking. So it's no surprise that many parents are concerned whether e-cigs will damage their kids' lung health. But, in fact, there is no documented link between e-cigs and lung damage. Another concern is addiction. Some people fear that e-cigarettes will take over their youth and replace cigarettes. But this isn't true. Addictive nicotine chewing gum and pills can be equally harmful as smoking, as they can trigger the same health problems and even die young. E-cigarettes don't do that, so it's actually better to use e-cigs than cigarettes. For teens, tobacco is much more dangerous than e-cigarettes and vaping, because it can make them heavier smokers later. There's another common concern: Are the e-liquids you buy risky to your family's health? E-liquid comes in a couple of flavors, and it's important to know what your specific device can and can't handle. Each e-liquid has a chance of containing different types of chemicals. E-liquids don't contain nicotine, so they shouldn't be toxic to your family. Furthermore, e-liquids include flavoring to attract to your taste buds. Some e-liquids contain nicotine, but you shouldn't use them with drug delivery devices, like a vaporizer. These devices will convert cartridges of e-liquid into dry smoke and ensure that nicotine stays safely out of your lungs. Finally,
