A double blind trial. A study was carried out in nondiabetic volunteers to find out whether chlorpropamide lowers plasma glucose in vivo. A dose of 80 mg/kg of chlorpropamide caused a fall in plasma glucose from 11.5 +/- 0.2 to 10.1 +/- 0.1 mmol/l (P less than 0.001) in the whole group and from 11.2 +/- 0.2 to 9.7 +/- 0.1 (P less than 0.001) in the group receiving a continuous subcutaneous infusion of regular human insulin. Both doses of chlorpropamide lowered fasting plasma insulin concentrations in all subjects and a significant fall in peak insulin levels during a glucose load was seen following treatment with 80 mg/kg of chlorpropamide.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to blowout preventer systems, and specifically to the use of a preventer monitoring system for detecting pressure increase and providing a signal to an operator of the system. 2. Description of the Prior Art Oil and gas drilling rigs use various types of blowout preventers to provide seals about tubular elements or casings, and to prevent the uncontrolled release of fluids into the environment. The blowout preventers come in a variety of types, including ram type and annular type. The ram type blowout preventer generally includes a hydraulically actuated ram that can be positioned within the wellbore to seal against a tubular element or the casing of the wellbore. The annular preventer typically includes a pair of annular shear rams with a frame for the shear rams, and with seals about each shear ram and the frame. One of the rams is driven into position within the wellbore and the shear rams are driven together by hydraulics, and the seals about the shear rams and the frame engage the tubular element or the casing of the wellbore, and seal there against. Typically, a ram type blowout preventer is used above the wellhead during drilling operations. Similarly, an annular blowout preventer can
