The present disclosure relates generally to displaying data associated with a tab bar, such as a workstation tab bar, in a manner that guides a user through, for example, a set of tabs, and more specifically, to providing a navigation history associated with a set of tabs displayed on a user interface. User interfaces, such as, for example, an electronic communication device's tab bar, a website's tab bar, and a set of tabs on a workstation display, oftentimes change for a number of reasons. For example, a user may interact with the user interface to request information or enter data and/or commands. Over time, for various reasons, the user interface may be changed. Also, user preferences or patterns may be changed over time. Thus, changes to the user interface, such as a change of tabs, may become irrelevant or incomplete, e.g., because of the user interface change. In an attempt to provide a more useful user interface, current user interfaces are configured to automatically navigate to a user's previous or current state if the user interface becomes inactive. For example, if the user tries to navigate to a "reset" function or some other state, the user interface will automatically retrieve the user's previous or current state. However, the user interface may also change without any user interaction. Accordingly, a user's ability to return to a previous state, or a user's current state, may be limited. Further, a user may often navigate to a desired previous or current state at a particular point in time, but become lost or confused when seeking the user's desired state at a later point in time.
