Day-night variations in mood, sleep, and weight A study has identified what it calls a "latent daytime mood-related effect" of low-intensity light exposure (specifically LED lighting) that is independent of its ability to cause acute circadian disruption. This was the finding of a study which suggests that diurnal changes in mood and behavior may be mediated by a separate system from the circadian one. The research, published in a recent issue of Neurobiology of Sleep, was led by Professor Jon Cole from the University of Cambridge's Department of Psychiatry, and it involved a study of 12 healthy young men. They all underwent one night of dark exposure from 10pm to 8am, as well as one night of full illumination from 1am to 10am. This was made up of a natural-light baseline and then one night of exposure to blue LED light. The results, which were published in the journal Neuroscience, showed that exposure to acute circadian disruption had no significant influence on mood or sleep. In contrast, the low-intensity light conditions led to greater negative mood. "We found that both the first and last block of illumination induced mood disruption that was not attributable to acute circadian phase misalignment. The negative mood induction was specific to diurnal lighting conditions. Both manipulations did not interact to produce an additive effect," commented Professor Cole. "Both the diurnal light exposure conditions induced greater negative mood than the dim light control." Although the primary aim of the study was to investigate the impact of "latent circadian alignment" under diurnal conditions on mood, it should be noted that insomnia prevalence increases during late night hours, and an episode of insomnia may have a negative influence on mood. This study did not confirm whether the presence of any insomnia symptoms had any influence on the findings, and this should be investigated further in future studies. More research is needed to fully understand the impact of low-intensity light on mood and behavior. However, the results may prompt further research into the impact of light on mood

Copying a div over another div I have two divs that I want to copy the content from one into the other. However I have a parent div that both these divs are nested inside. I've been trying different things but I can't get the styles to copy correctly.

var div1 = document.g
etElementById("div1");
var div2 = document.g
etElementById("div2");
    div1.innerHTML =
    div2.innerHTML; Hello
Hi I would expect to see
    "Hello" from div1
copied over to div2 but what I get is both divs rendered as "Hi". I'm assuming this is because the styles
    aren't copying over correctly but I've been trying different things for a few days. A: You just need to change the following line: `var div1 = document.getElementById("div1");` to `var div1 = document.getElementByIdById("div1")` See updated fiddle: `var div1 = document.getElementByIdById("div1"); var div2 = document.getElementByIdById("div2"); div1.innerHTML = div2.innerHTML;`
