The 47-year-old guard, who retired in 2009, won't be a part of the Indiana Pacers' coaching staff this season, but according to "Bleacher Report" reported that the "Pacers were in talks with Scott Brooks to make his return to the franchise a reality." According to Hollinger, the Pacers believed they were making "gains on his desire to return." Indiana has retained the services of assistant coach Brian Shaw and has hired Kenny Atkinson as a full-time assistant. One of the reasons Brooks was offered the position with the Thunder was to work with Kevin Durant. Although the guard's decision to leave Oklahoma City was a shock, it has put the Thunder's front office in a position where it must now give some serious thought as to how it will deal with Durant's contract situation. While Durant is still under contract until 2016, it is highly unlikely that the Thunder would be willing to give the star a max contract. If they were to decide to approach Durant and his camp about an extension, they would surely have to approach it with the clear understanding that they would be paying him much less money than what he has already earned. It is also far too early for the Thunder to reach a deal with Durant on a new contract. If the plan is to convince Durant to enter free agency next summer, the Thunder would be facing a dilemma in regards to the impact that such a move would have on their lineup. It would likely be difficult for the team to convince Kevin Martin and Thabo Sefolosha to re-sign with the Thunder at current cap values. The Thunder will also have to figure out how to fit Serge Ibaka into the mix. To make matters worse, the Thunder is also likely to lose Kevin Martin to free agency. The 26-year-old guard has emerged as one of the best 3-point shooters in the NBA and is just beginning to prove his scoring ability. Durant

is inspired by classic PC games like System Shock as well as The Big Muddy and Dungeon Keeper. We wanted to create a game inspired by those earlier games, so we started with the technical framework. We build it up, piece-by-piece, that way; because we wanted to understand what it meant for players to have a persistent world, what possibilities there are with sharing a world between multiple players. That's why we've been working on the PC version, but we got the idea a long time ago - around 2015 - that we'd make this for mobile and integrate it with Apple Arcade. We're very happy to be able to announce that we're launching on iOS on April 30th, and on Android in June. The game is about conversing with people, but at the same time, you're free to step back and survey the situation if you want to. What you're observing isn't just your own, it's shared by anyone else that's willing to allow themselves to be shown. So the human aspect is gameplay but it's also an agent of change. You have a camera that you can send out to see if a person is willing to come and show themselves to you, to talk to you and show themselves to you. "Even though we refer to it as an AI, we didn't really build it out on top of any real AI or any other sorts of artificial technology," Holbrook says. "We believe that there really is a ton of potential there for us to interface with other people, and these people are emerging in a new way, largely through games, as a means of fulfilling their desire to communicate with one another." So, technically we're building a system by which we can connect people to one another, and use that for our own purposes. "Because it's a lot of technology of this social sort of interface, it's hard to write it down and it's hard to boil it down," Holbrook says. "The people that are showing up through games, they're sort of the tip of the iceberg, and we're talking a lot about alternate organizations, really strong organizations, these sort of new world-building
