Apple was previously allowed to hold onto patents relating to the iPhone and iPad, but during the six-year commercial agreement was obligated to sell off patents that it held because of an ongoing patent dispute with Samsung. This wasn't the first time that Apple had been forced to sell off patents as part of a settlement after a failed lawsuit with Samsung. "Following the settlement, Apple is entitled to a refund of all payments made to the European Patent Office," a spokesperson for the Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market told the FT. "As a result, the total refund will be €2.51bn ($2.66bn). Apple will continue to use these royalties to fund further research and development." In a statement to AppleInsider, Samsung said the investment was "to fund R&D for the future and is an investment in Apple, both companies, and the industry." Intel got a boost in the press release, with Apple CEO Tim Cook saying his company "has an enormous track record of creating innovations that spur industry growth. Just as Intel has helped power the technology revolution for the past 40 years, Apple has helped make the personal computer, smartphone and tablet the center of the digital universe." Apple's appeal to its EU counterparts is likely to be made, as Cook was a member of the jury that decided to acquit Samsung of all charges. He also attended this year's appeals hearing and was in attendance when Samsung won its appeal.[Diagnostic and therapeutic problems in patients with chronic recurrent pancreatitis]. One hundred and eleven patients with chronic relapsing pancreatitis were subjected to a complex examination of the duodenum and pancreas.
