Mood disorders are among the most common of all brain disorders, and represent a major public health burden. Despite the high prevalence of mood disorders and the significant morbidity associated with these conditions, biological knowledge of the underlying pathophysiology of mood disorders remains sparse. While substantial progress has been made in recent years in the elucidation of the underlying neurobiological abnormalities in mood disorders, most of this knowledge is based on studies employing neuroimaging. Recent neuroimaging studies in mood disorders have used a variety of neuroimaging techniques, with the most widely used being magnetic resonance imaging (MRI), single photon emission computerized tomography (SPECT), and functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI). We review the strengths and limitations of structural and functional neuroimaging in mood disorders, with specific focus on current state of knowledge. For instance, techniques such as voxel-based morphometry (VBM) and diffusion tensor imaging (DTI) hold promise as means of examining morphological and microstructural abnormalities in mood disorders, while task-based functional neuroimaging techniques can identify regional abnormalities in the brain's response to information processing relevant to mood disorders. Finally, we discuss the potential of multimodal neuroimaging e79ca774b

The State Board of Elections will hold a forum Monday to answer questions about its website, the longest running and most contentious of a number of complaints against the agency — even before the elections were held. The issue was thrust into the national spotlight during the Nov. 6, election where the election result was unchanged despite the fact that over 42,000 voter registration cards were stolen. Attorney Jeff Bloom is sponsoring a forum to answer questions about its website. Credit: Brian Wilson "There's a lot of questions out there to just kind of get a sense for what's going on," said Jeff Bloom, attorney for the Democratic Party and a member of the State Board of Elections. Opposition groups have brought previous complaints against the board to the attention of the state attorney general's office and court, but that office found that the election violations were not severe enough to warrant further action. The State Board of Elections says it received about 38,000 complaints about the Nov. 6 election and sent about 10,000 to voters. Voter registration activity in the U.S. is overseen by the Federal Election Commission. Those waiting to vote Nov. 6 who received an email and the voter registration card were called to make sure their eligibility was verified. However, they were still able to vote even if those cards were missing or no longer valid. One registration form was sent to Georgia's supervisor of elections with information about the voter's current residence, and another to the county registrar with information about whether the voter had voted before. Each of the four elections were held without a significant change in results. Related Content There were complaints of problems with voter registration cards issued by the Board of Elections. Without the cards, voters aren't able to cast an actual vote. The thousands of voter registration forms were sent to the Elections Department, but the department has so far been unable to produce a precise number. WSB Radio's Rick Tumlin reports that the Board of Elections says it hasn't received a single complaint about the state
