Primary treatment failure of chronic myelogenous leukemia (CML) is often due to resistance to imatinib. A recent study demonstrated that the cellular and molecular consequences of imatinib treatment on CML cells can be overcome with low-dose imatinib. This article discusses the mechanism of action and the clinical implications of these findings. Literature was accessed from 1950 to November 2005 using MEDLINE (National Library of Medicine), Embase, and the Cochrane Library. References from retrieved articles were also reviewed. Studies were selected for review if they analyzed the effect of low-dose imatinib treatment on primary CML cells. Studies were included in qualitative synthesis. Most studies were small, retrospective, and observational. While most patients achieved a complete hematologic response with low-dose imatinib, most patients with primary imatinib failure could be converted to low-dose imatinib, provided they had a low Sokal risk and tolerated imatinib. A subset of patients with Ph+ CML achieved a complete cytogenetic response (CCyR) with low-dose imatinib. The current evidence supports a strategy of treating CML patients in chronic phase with low-dose imatinib to reduce the risk of primary treatment failure. The use of low-dose imatinib for the treatment of patients with CML in early blast crisis or accelerated phase is less well established.
