Fear of Falling in older people: causes, consequences and treatment. Fear of falling increases with age and is responsible for a significant proportion of falls in older people. There is a growing evidence base for the effectiveness of interventions aimed at reducing fear of falling. These treatments are either based on cognitive behaviour therapy or computerised therapy. Both are effective in reducing fear of falling but little is known about the mechanisms that mediate the change in fear of falling. Future research is required to establish if the decrease in fear of falling is achieved through reducing the triggering of fear processes or through changing the effect of fear on behaviour. The latter can involve changing fear responses or modifying the conditions that elicit fear responses. There is a need to explore how fear is manifested in the behavioural and psychological symptoms of dementia.

Quantum physics on the nanoscale is revealing how nature behaves at the smallest scales. Some of the most promising research applications of these new insights could be achieved with a new kind of 'nanoscale' quantum device called a nanowire. Wired for Quantum Computing

First observed in the 1970s, nanowires are single layers of semiconductors such as silicon or germanium that are "nanoscale" in size. Like conventional silicon components, nanowires are made from atoms arranged in repeating patterns. However, they are so tiny that their atoms can no longer be seen by conventional optical microscopy. Recently, researchers have been experimenting with ways to make these nanowires spin, or spin polarized, using the principles of quantum mechanics. Electrons in a wire take on both discrete, quantized energy values and an angular momentum, or spin. In effect, each electron in a spin-polarized nanowire acts like a tiny magnet. This behavior is analogous to the spin of an ordinary magnet, but the analogy doesn't end there. One of the most useful characteristics of a magnet is its orientation – whether it points north, south, east or west. Electrons in a spin-polarized nanowire are also oriented. Just like the orientation of the poles of a magnet, the orientation of an electron in a nanowire points in one of two directions – up or down. At the same time, the electron has a spin. As long as the electron's spin is oriented the same way as the nanowire'

6th September 2013.Q: SQL query to select all field from a certain date when a certain time is on the end of that day
I'm trying to write a sql query that will do the following task:

A user clicks on a date, and this event gets added to a database, but I don't want to add any new data if that data has already been added on the day that he clicks. The date is one of the following values in the DB: 2013-08-28 2013-08-29 2013-08-30 The users are sorted by a column named 'created', with the first user being the one that was added first, and so on, so its user with a creation date later than his own would be the second row. The created timestamp is structured like this in the DB (note that some users have changed their date format from original):
2013-08-28 00:00:00 2013-08-28 21:20:00 2013-08-29 00:00:00 2013-08-29 21:40:00 2013-08-30 00:00:00 2013-08-30 21:40:00 Now what I want is to select all the rows from the DB that have the same date in the created column (in this example, it would be 2013-08-29 and 2013-08-30), but with a created field that is equal to the time that the user clicks. So the first user clicks at 1:20, so I want to show him the row that says the same date, and that is the row that was created after
