"With the option to broadcast live on radio and our strong role in delivering our first ever free-to-air TV channel, Freeview, and an IPTV platform, it would provide a new, reliable and modern platform for the country's broadcast sectors. "This will help us to attract new businesses, provide services and offer choices and it will benefit everyone - including people who live in rural areas and other communities that lack this important technology - as well as the public sector. "Many people were questioning whether we could do all this for £8.1 billion. "We have taken that challenge on and worked hard to deliver the best use of every pound of public funding possible and we have done so without borrowing any more money from the banks." Sir Vince Cable, leader of the Liberal Democrats and Business Secretary, said: "This is a landmark day for our country. For the first time we will be able to broadcast every single programme live to every single home in this country. "This will be of enormous benefit to everyone - broadcasting will be even more accessible than it already is, as well as the public getting important government and BBC programmes for free." Tim Farron, leader of the Liberal Democrats and homes and communities secretary, said: "This is a big day for the UK. "For the first time ever, we will be broadcasting to everyone in the UK. This will give the UK
