I'm reading all the definitions in the internet, and I find many interpretations of the concept of a hard link: the only correct answer is the following link: A hard link is also called hard link or file hard link. A hard link differs from a soft link in that the hard link refers to a file on disk and is not dependent on where it resides on disk. An example of a hard link is a file named myfile and two identical hard links are created to this file; both the hard links are pointing to the same file on disk. But, what does it really mean? Let me put it this way: A file named myfile has two hard links. Why? I suppose I can think of two files named myfile; for example, the links are /dev/sda2/myfile and /dev/sda2/myfile. If I delete the second hard link, will I lose the data under this file? Or, is my understanding wrong, because two identical hard links do not point to two different files, so deleting one of them will leave the data as it was before? A: First of all, to understand what a hard link is, you should know how file system works. A file system, as a whole, has an inode structure. An inode is a block of meta data, it includes file mode, permissions, and other attributes pointer(s) to other inodes, called directory entries a pointer to a directory entry, called directory entry pointer a pointer to a file, called file pointer To read and update an inode, firmware in data cable, possibly followed by a driver in OS (in case of Linux or Microsoft Windows the disk driver is the same) disk drive (FAT, NTFS, ext4) exists on top of the block level of the disk. Each block on disk is represented by a sector, which contains a small number of bytes
