Q: How to use Magento cache in a class that is not used on any of the pages I have a method which searches the db for an item and stores the result in the cache. This method is called by ajax. It never runs on a page. However, i'd like it to be used by scripts on other pages. Would it be necessary to copy this class into an extension and include it in every page where it is called, or can I use the magento cache to store the results? A: If it's not used on a page, it should be stored in the Magento cache. From the cache's perspective you're a user on one of the pages, so if you put the cache data in a cache with the page's session id you can access it from any other page. You can then combine this cache with the current page's session (the cache's key will be the page's unique identifier), or any other identifier, including custom ones if they should be processed as an item. You can read more about it here: Q: Command line switch for batch command How do I write the following command
