and will never be made to pay." More recently, Alberto Gonzales, now the Attorney General of the United States, sent an email that again cited the Miranda warning to the infamous Libby Wilson, who was convicted on charges of perjury, obstruction of justice, and making false statements. Woodward wrote a book about the entire Iraq war fiasco, dubbed The War Within. In it, he said that Cheney's legal adviser, the former U.S. solicitor general, failed to get Cheney to sign the warnings, which was devastating to his client. Even the executive branch's own White House Counsel, Alberto Gonzales, had to admit in a moment of candor that he had overreached by telling the National Security Council staff to ignore the warning. "When he [Gonzales] suggested that he did not want the White House Counsel's Office to issue a written notification of the President's Article II powers under Section 4(d) of the UCMJ, he forgot to mention the authority he was exercising," wrote Henry Waxman, the House of Representative's top ethics lawyer in a letter to Gonzales. "Congressional Ethics, the Judicial Conference, the U.S. Attorneys and the Public Integrity units of the FBI and the DOJ will all remind you of your responsibilities under the regulations governing the issuance of such warnings." Two weeks later, in a press briefing, Gonzales admitted he had overreached himself. "I was speaking at the very least, in part, with the authority of the president," he said. "I should have conferred with the White House Counsel and I had an obligation to consult with the attorney general and the department before I issued it. I didn't do that. That was a mistake." Still, as far as one of the Justice Department's top lawyers is concerned, "we did not improperly apply the standards of the [Department of Defense] in issuing the warning to Libby," Gonzales told reporters. He was asked if he would have been wrong to ignore President Bush's orders to follow the War Crimes Act and the explicit language of the U.S. Military Code in issuing this warning. "We were properly following the standards of the Department of Defense in our decision to issue the warning," said Gonzales. "We followed the rules and the policies we had in place." Note: The United States military is the first branch of the U.S. government to publicly admit that the law does not require a
