New Zealand is among several African countries that are seriously examining their shale oil potential. WHAT ABOUT THE OIL PAPERWORK? In the past, regulatory frameworks have been built around protecting shareholders from the potential downside of oil and gas operations, and ensuring companies got access to capital and a return on their investment. But that has changed, with the emergence of two competing interest groups in the industry: The 'activists', who seek to sue companies over the potential environmental and social damage oil and gas operations could cause. The 'high-net-worth individuals' (HNWIs), who seek to offshore their investments from potential long-term environmental damage while they wait for the sector to reach its 'peak'. So while regulatory frameworks have had to evolve to meet these changes, they are being monitored – and reformed – around the world. Investors seeking to invest in the US 595f342e71
