Hip replacement may be associated with significant perioperative blood loss. Perioperative autologous blood donation is a useful technique which may reduce blood transfusion requirements. We studied 72 consecutive patients undergoing primary elective total hip replacement with respect to blood transfusion requirements, operating time, anaesthesia, and hospital stay. Thirty-two patients donated and 40 did not. All patients received epidural anaesthesia and the mean amount of homologous blood transfused was 255 ml greater in the autologous group (p
