Q: How can I update a service to add a new web interface? I have a running (up and running) service that I control from a website by handling events. Now, the website needs to add a new web interface. The new interface would register itself as a new service and notify the application that wants to listen for events. What is the best way to achieve this? Somethings I can think of: A new class (MyNewService) that inherits from the current interface (MyOldService), adding the new features. Sending an e-mail to some remote email address that can update the service's configuration to include the new web interface. Is there a better way? A: A new class (MyNewService) that inherits from the current interface (MyOldService), adding the new features. Sorry, but this is probably the worst possible approach. There is no notion of "inheritence", in object-oriented programming. Thus, the only option is to overload the methods of MyOldService to call the new MyNewService methods. This has the ugly side effect of having to change the contract of MyOldService. If you have access
