that's only a year old but looks like it's 10 years old. The quirky, windowless place on Pennsylvania Avenue sits between restaurants, embassies, and luxury hotels. It looks like it's built to withstand the test of time. But there's nothing quaint about its purpose. The headquarters of the National Security Agency, the U.S. intelligence agency known for its vast domestic surveillance apparatus, holds some of the deepest and darkest secrets of the American government. It will remain standing for decades to come.

The building, the formerly existing headquarters of the National Security Agency, is located on West Executive Drive, tucked into the western wall of the District of Columbia. The headquarters, which was built in 1959 and underwent several improvements and additions through the years, is at street level, within the executive branch of the federal government. The building is surrounded by a 6-foot-high wrought-iron fence and has security guards posted. The NSA doesn't issue a press release about it or even speak about it; this isn't a tourist attraction. Instead, the headquarters is defined by its two towers — one taller than the other — which are clad in stainless steel and are visible from the windows of passing planes. But you don't need to fly over the District to see the location. The building is easily identifiable: It's got giant 18-inch-wide black windows. And it's the only brown- and beige-colored building on the National Mall, other than the monuments themselves. The NSA quietly moved into the building and its bistro in May 2013, according to the Washington Post, hiring more than 160 civilian workers to replace the 100 intelligence officers who'd been permanently stationed in a building adjacent to the National Mall.

The Post reported that the agency moved into the District as a response to the passage of a 2013 law that gutted the NSA's authority to collect and search phone call records of Americans.
Several former intelligence officials told the Post that the agency began quietly preparing to move into its new digs in 2011, just a few months after Congress passed the Patriot Act in response to the Sept e79caf774b

With your Google account, you can do stuff like send emails, access your own calendars, upload photos and files, and lots more. But there's a cost to using your Google account for all this stuff. Google have a two-pronged strategy for looking after the account. The first prong involves signing up for a Google Apps account, where you have your own personal account that's tied to your job. This Google account is where you'll get most of the value out of your Google account. The second prong is the use of Google Apps for work email and calendar accounts for your workplace users, who can log in with their Google account credentials. In the first example (your own Google account), Google have control over what can be done with your account. For example, they limit the number of photos you can have per calendar to 30, and they have a very tight control over how much disk space you can have and what sort of data you can save. However, as Google Apps for work does this for you, you don't get the same level of control, just the ability to use your own Google account for all the services that

Google Apps for work provides. That means you can have 30 photo uploads and 50 GB of storage per calendar, for example, but be responsible for any and all costs associated with this. As it stands, you get all the value for free if you're a company using Google Apps for work. However, a new leak has suggested that there could be a new feature in the works to offer a feature-rich webmail experience for your Google Apps users. Such a feature could be widely available as soon as Google's next I/O event in May. But in reality, the feature won't make much of a difference for your Google Apps users if it does come to fruition. It will just mean you'll get to use a webmail client without having to sign up for a Google Apps account.
