What should one do when doing the following: (A) starts a question with an attempt to solve a problem by doing a Google search (B) adds results to the question, e.g. an external link or a brief description of a search result (C) visits a question and comments something along the lines of "I don't do this, but here are some links where you could look for help" All three possibilities should be good to ask, but not necessarily answerable. Although (C) does not really fit the definition of a list, it does constitute a not constructive list in a lot of cases. The response to this "listing" activity should not be an attempt to "close" the question, but something more like: "Okay, I've given you a list, please read it and update the question with the results". Note that the question about the applicability of the community rules on custom close reasons is valid, but has a different objective. A: What should one do when doing the following? (A) starts a question with an attempt to solve a problem by doing a Google search (B) adds results to the question, e.g. an external link or a brief description of a search result (C) visits a question and comments something along the lines of "I don't do this, but here are some links where you could look for help" There is simply no reason why such questions should be around. The only thing we should do in such cases is to remove them - delete. A question might be a duplicate and the user might not be able to decide what they need to know from different questions. But when there is a glaringly obvious problem with the question, then we should remove it rather than having it hanging around here like a bad smell. When other people find such questions, they should close them as "Unable to locate answer" or perhaps as "Too broad"

I am trying to debug a memory related issue and am trying to find the line that is causing a long running process to hang. If I run top, when it's hanging the process name is chrome.exe, the library is dotnet. What's the best way to find the library that is causing this? Has anyone found an automated way to do this? I've tried using ProcessExplorer, Process Monitor, and Process Explorer in the system monitor, none of them have been able to find anything when chrome.exe is hanging. A: According to Microsoft documentation, to dump the stack of a process go to the ProcessMonitor tool and click on 'Attach to Process'. You can then dump the stack by setting a break point in the attached program. You can also dump memory of the process and send it to Microsoft's dump tool, here's the doc link. There's a c# wrapper in the virtualbox project, hopefully it's stable enough to use: 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a semiconductor device and a method for manufacturing the same. In this specification, a semiconductor device generally means a device which can function by utilizing semiconductor characteristics, and an electro-optical device, a semiconductor circuit, and an electronic device are all semiconductor devices. 2.
