Q: How can I get the incorrect filesize which show that files are deleted, but cannot remove them? I made a small python script which recursively gets files and their sizes. It runs into a problem when a file with an incorrect size is deleted. python clearly shows that the file is no longer there, however the return status is 0. (The filesize is still in the database and my backup tools make backups to the same location, but they are not doing it after writing 0 byte to the directory). If I try to remove the directory the system returns error 256. While the filesize is correct, the OS thinks it is a directory and can no longer delete it. How can I make it work? A: Delete the directory and its sub-directories, but don't delete the base file itself.

FreeGOCO: A Framework for Modelling Multiple Correlated Outcomes.

When a clinician or health policy decision-maker wishes to calculate the impact of an intervention on health outcomes across different populations, the most effective technique is to use modelling. However, modelling with multiple correlated outcomes (MCMO) poses new challenges for researchers and practitioners. With MCMO, the traditional methods employed in the existing software and packages for modelling may be too cumbersome, and the conventional statistical tools are not sufficiently powerful for making statistically sound decisions. We created a flexible framework to support statistical modelling for MCMO and to facilitate the identification of the optimal combination of study designs and analysis methods.

GOCO (Genetics Of Correlated Outcomes) is a freely available platform that is built on the Microsoft.NET Framework that allows users to easily build and run MCMO models. It can also export the obtained results to different software packages or statistical tools, providing a comprehensive solution for MCMO modelling. We demonstrate the functionality and application of GOCO using three real-world datasets. With GOCO, we are now able to support researchers and decision-makers in calculating the effects of interventions across different subpopulations that are subjected to different treatment strategies on multiple correlated outcomes.Q:
