A number of commentators have pointed out that this weekend's presidential election in Colombia looks almost certain to give the country a right-wing victory. The most likely outcome, according to widely followed Colombian political analyst, Jorge Restrepo, is that Colombia's current centre-right coalition - in which the ruling party controls most of the seats in Congress - will win 64 seats of Colombia's 131 seats in the lower house of Congress, with the breakaway, right-wing parties winning 64 seats. Any total between 44 and 64 seats will be enough to form a governing majority, unless the smaller parties achieve something remarkable. The country's history is littered with populist uprisings. But its right-wing and rebel movements are often portrayed, in the mainstream media, as remarkably modern. This was evident, for example, in the reporting of Miguel Landazabal's 6d1f23a050
