The film's plot concerns a Detroit school basketball coach (Poitier) and his young son. Plot The film begins with an elderly black man and his young granddaughter having a conversation in a diner about the Detroit Tigers, including the player Miguel Cabrera. A few minutes later, the daughter, who is a schoolteacher, saves her friend Doris from being mugged, but misses her fare (a man in a large group). They drive home, where the daughter greets her mother and presents the fare, which turns out to be her father. The granddaughter, Christine, enters and proclaims, "My daddy doesn't take people he can't trust, and he's not mean." The film then cuts to the present day, where we see Maurice Meechum (Richard Pryor) as the Detroit Tigers' baseball coach, giving a pep talk to his players, during a game. At one point, he reprimands his team for not rooting for the Tigers, and the audience can see the scoreboard declaring the score as 0-11, before the players change it to 11-0. The story then shifts to Detroit, where we see Maurice and his 16-year-old son, Walter (Sidney Poitier), arguing at home. Walter quits his job as an insurance salesman to play baseball, and after the Tigers' first win, he knocks over a statue of John L. Smith, the team's former owner. Walter is then arrested, and is taken to court, where the judge sentences him to the rest of his days in jail, despite the lawyer Maurice hired for Walter trying to get his sentence reduced. To keep himself busy, Maurice and Christine co-teach a class on
