Comparison of a single-incision laparoscopic (SILS) and multiport laparoscopic (MPL) approach for laparoscopic distal pancreatectomy. Single-incision laparoscopic surgery (SILS) is considered to be less invasive, but may also be associated with a higher rate of surgical complications. Multiport laparoscopic surgery (MPL) is generally associated with more invasive surgical procedures compared with SILS, but has been reported to be associated with better cosmetic results. In this study, we compared the surgical results and patient's satisfaction using the SILS and MPL approach for laparoscopic distal pancreatectomy. Sixty-four consecutive patients who had distal pancreatectomy by SILS or MPL between April 2008 and February 2010 were enrolled in this study. Patient characteristics, postoperative outcomes, and satisfaction with cosmetic results were retrospectively compared between the two surgical approaches. The duration of surgery (5.2+/-0.5 vs. 4.2+/-0.9 h), and intraoperative blood loss (100+/-65 vs. 145+/-83 mL) were significantly higher, and the frequency of lymph node dissection (44% vs. 74%) was significantly lower in the MPL group than in the SILS group. However, there were no significant differences in the other surgical outcomes, such as frequency of complication and conversion 6d1f23a050
