Region: China.Q: Creating an Async Client Socket Application in C++ I am trying to create a client side socket application using a C++ Win32 application. The main idea behind the application is that the server does not know anything about the client before receiving its request. From my understanding this is possible using asynchronous socket programming. To that end, I have created a client using the example code from the msdn website. I am able to connect to the server after sending a message that I am connected, but as soon as I send a message to the server, the program seems to hang. Does anyone have any idea what is causing this problem? The source code is below: #include #include #include #include using namespace std; // This function is called by the 'connect' // function in main.cpp. int Connect (SOCKET hSocket, const struct sockaddr *pRemoteHostName, int RemoteHostNameLength) { int nRet = WSASocket (h 6d1f23a050
