It's been a huge blessing to me. I've created posts about everything from my mother-in-law, to watching my daughter's Halloween costume, to teaching reading to my second graders. In fact, one of my very first posts was a picture of "me" praying. It was a moment in my life I'll never forget. A few years back, I began to think about my own blog. "What do I want to do here? What will it be about?" I asked myself. I wasn't sure what direction I wanted to go. I knew that I had a mind full of ideas and thoughts but no place to put them. So, for a while, I wrote out my thoughts in my journal. Then one day, I decided to begin putting ideas to paper. I created a plan. I sat down one day and made a post about my day. When I blogged my days, I did it every day. I wrote about what I did and who I saw. I was actually getting my thoughts out there for me to see as I typed. I put my thoughts on paper for me. I felt I was helping me to be better at remembering things, helping me to get organized, and for me, being better at being an adult. After a few months of using this system, I realized my online journal, like the journal I kept growing up, was keeping me organized. It was helping me be better at remembering. It was helping me be a better person. Today, I want to say thank you to my blog. Thank you for telling me "me." Thank you for letting me practice being a good adult. Thank you for helping me be organized. Thank you for letting me be who I am today.The relationship between postural feedback and the activity of the ovaries in the domestic bitch. 1.
