come to understand that books are our spiritual bread and water. This realization has not made books any more endearing for me. Book shopping is a chore that I loathe. My shelves are filled with books that I might want to read soon and might have read before and even one or two that I must have read before. On paper, my shelves look neat and orderly, but on the actual shelves they are a jumble and confusion. But I keep them for my books, specially created for me, by those who know me well, who love me and who understand my needs. Books bring to life the romance of literature and make us dream. The book represents the sole wellspring of literature; every book is a world of its own. Literature is the string that ties the diverse worlds of the universe together. When we write and when we read a book, we find universal truth in the simplest things. Literature and poetry take us to the core of human emotions. So I am not a book freak. I have not kept any collection or even a card file of books for the past three decades or so. I don't read many books any more either. But I keep a special library of books that have special meaning. Books that I will read next time I am sitting in the sun with the eyes closed and
