Ever since veteran President, Putera Dedi Prasetyo, took over the chair of Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono in 2006, the country has set itself targets in the areas of agriculture, economic, fiscal, and political – and now, elections. The presidential race has been overshadowed in recent weeks by the fact that the TNI is preparing for the nationwide elections. On August 23, I chaired the debate on 'Ethics and Morality' during the Pesda Dialogue, where I presented my recommendations on the issue, which I plan to convey to the Indonesians through a book entitled, 'Ethics and Morality'. What will be different this time is that the focus of the elections will shift from the presidential, legislative, and regional elections to the gubernatorial elections, which are a big step for Indonesia. The big difference is that, for the first time in six years, members of the legislative and executive branches, as well as regional governors, will be elected. In the past, there was no limit as to the number of positions the candidates can contest. As a result, the political race has always been a struggle between the Government and the Republic Party (PBB). The presidential race, as in the past, will be a battle between the current President and his former deputy. c6a93da74d
