using ASP.NET on my server to save server resources, and it's working well. ~~~ hapless ASP.NET is part of the problem in this case. The server can spend a lot of time waiting for one client to make one request, and hitting the database, waiting for a round-trip, etc. Instead of using a server for authentication and authorization, and then a data store for data, just use a simple user model (app.user = User({auth:fs.authenticate()})). Every database query can be cached on the server, and the database can be accessed directly. For authentication, the user store can be just a list of ids, rather than reduce the protocol to a custom cookie. The node.js server can parse the entire page in parallel, saving the client from having to wait for the page to load, if the page is bloated.
