Epidural abscesses are rare, accounting for 5% to 7% of all spinal infections. The aetiology of epidural abscesses, and therefore the approach to treatment, varies with the anatomical site involved. In cases of discitis, initial treatment should usually be with antibiotics. Surgery should be reserved for patients who have progressive neurological deficits or a known abscess located in the epidural space. Early diagnosis and treatment of epidural abscesses reduces the morbidity associated with the disease. Diagnosis usually requires high-quality MRI and an awareness of the clinical features in the context of spinal infection. Caudal epidural infections are typically managed with a course of intravenous antibiotic therapy. Thoracic epidural abscesses are usually managed with antibiotic therapy alone. Cranial and dorsal epidural abscesses are treated with both intravenous and suppressive antibiotic therapy. Q: Default Middleware for Asserting Users I've recently discovered the need to assert that a user is in a specific scope. I'm building an app using Asp.Net Identity using Individual User Accounts. I'm trying to use a custom middleware to check if a user is in a certain scope as follows: The Middleware public class ScopeGuard : HttpContextBase { c6a93da74d
